Peper was tried the latter part of February and convicted of murder in the second degree. He was sentenced to fifteen years in prison.

During his trial it was shown that Julia Mills had struck Freedborn over the head with a bottle.

Dr. Bernard Saur, of St. Vincent's Hoopital, was the principal witness to day. He described Freedborn's wounds. The prosecution tried to show that the fracture was due to Freedborn being struck with the bottle, but Dr. Saur would not swear to this, as the fracture could have been made with the ciub that Peper used.
